

I view the FCC's position in this matter, the Telephone Consumer Protection Act, with grave concern. This is another instance of federally empowered business supported "damn-the-people" bureaucrats attempting to chisel away at the freedom of the American people. Why should any one have the right to call me if I do not wish to be called? No one should have that legal right except in cases of established national defense need and in emergencies to safeguard the lives of people. Instead of weakening consumer protections in this area, the Federal Government should be strengthening them, true to the idea of a government by the people and for the people. New Jersey's legislation offers the federal government not only a path in this issue, but it should be left alone. How about spending your energies and the taxpayers' money in protecting the American people against internet fraud and identity snatching?
